What have I done this week?

So far this week, I've completed work for the dropdown selection on my group's Project Survivor webpage, and I started and completed a feature map for our project for our project completion presentation. For the presentation, I also contributed some of the things that I had a hard time completing throughout the entirety of this project.

This week I met with an individual that Brother Godfrey recommended that I meet with. Jake was very helpful and offered good insight into my performance tracking for the semester. He recommended that I make goals to try using new project managements tools each week. I also adjusted my feedback JotForm according to feedback I received from both Jake and Brother Godfrey.

What will I do next week?

Next week, I am planning on helping to present the successes of Project Survivor. I will decide on what I'd like my next project, PickShip, to look like upon completion. The hope is that I will have wireframes completed for the project.

What didn't go well this week?

Communication about duties within the group has not been as good as I'd hoped they would be. Not many of the other group members let us know when they begin work on something or what they are planning on doing. This caused problems on my end because I was attempting to get the project finished, so I did what I knew had to be done and informed team members when I began work and ended work on specific jobs. This made some group members frustrated because they started work on this, but did not tell anyone that they had.
